1. The Ecological Footprint and Food Consumption

The following table is a comparison of data that is easily accessed by the Sustainable Agricultural Researcher, which provides food consumption in the United States in 2010, and data calculated by applying the ecological footprint for various food types.

Source: 1. Examples of various food types, including the ecological footprint for each food type, are provided in the table above. 2. The ecological footprint for each food type is calculated by dividing the total food consumption by the total land area available for food production. 3. The ecological footprint for each food type is calculated by dividing the total food consumption by the total land area available for food production.

- (a) The table above provides data on the ecological footprint for the various food types and compares the food consumption to the ecological footprint.

- (b) Calculate the ecological footprint for each food type in the United States, including all of the food types that are consumed. The ecological footprint for each food type is calculated by dividing the total food consumption by the total land area available for food production.
