

CHAPTER 5: FOUNDATIONS OF EMPLOYEE MOTIVATION

How Does It Work?

- Motivation: describes the psychological processes "that underline the direction, intensity, and persistence of behavior or thought"
- Extrinsic Motivation: results from the potential or actual receipt of external rewards
- Intrinsic Motivation: occurs when an individual is inspired by "the positive internal feelings that are generated by doing well"

The Two Fundamental Perspectives on Motivation: An Overview

- Researchers have proposed two general categories of motivation theories: content theories and process theories
- Content Theories: identify internal factors such as needs and satisfaction that energize employee motivation
- Process Theories: explain the process by which internal factors and situational factors influence employee motivation
- It's important to understand both motivational perspectives because they offer different solutions for handling motivational problems

Content Theories of Motivation

- Content Theories of Motivation: based on the idea that an employee's needs influence his or her motivation
- Needs: are defined as physiological or psychological deficiencies that arouse behavior
- They can be strong or weak and are influenced by environmental factors. This tells you that human needs vary over time and place

McGregor's Theory X and Theory Y

- Theory X: a pessimistic view of employees: They dislike work, must be monitored, and can be motivated only with rewards and punishment ("carrots and sticks")
- Theory Y: a modern and positive set of assumptions about people at work: They are self-engaged, committed, responsible, and creative

Maslow's Need Hierarchy Theory: Five Levels of Needs

- In 1943, psychologist Abraham Maslow published his now-famous need hierarchy theory of motivation. Although the theory was based on his clinical observation of a few neurotic individuals, it has subsequently been used to explain the entire spectrum of human behavior
- The Need Hierarchy Theory: states that motivation is a function of five basic needs: psychological, safety, love, esteem, and self-actualization
