

Historical References to Midwifery and Post-Birth Care

During the 17th century, childbirth in England was inherently a social, domestic event, firmly rooted in a female domain. Historically, women and infants were cared for by unqualified local women known as 'gossips' who were usually more mature, married and had themselves given birth.

They provided support during labour and for up to six weeks after the birth, helping with domestic duties and supporting the mother to recuperate after the birth. Birth predominantly took place within the home and was followed by a 'lying in period' described by Calder in 1912.
