It has been suggested that the specific values are tied to those with East-West orientation and that are talking about their orientation in terms of being an "authoritarian" society. Evidence of authoritarianism was higher than in the United States, but it was not higher than in Japan, Germany, and France. However, more likely, they called their society "authoritarian" to distinguish it from the United States, which they viewed as "democratic." The Japanese were also concerned to distinguish their orientation from that of the United States, which they viewed as "democratic." In addition, it is not surprising that the Japanese were more authoritarian than the United States, which is an authoritarian society in the sense that it is a society in which the government is the dominant force.
