

About Praying Mantis

Mantises have prominent front legs for catching prey. They usually stand in an upright pose, with their forearms folded. This makes it look like they are deep in prayer! Praying mantises are related to termites and cockroaches.

Praying mantises' distinctive appearances act as camouflage for defense. They are the only insect to see in 3D. They excel at detecting prey from a distance, but their depth perception only works when the prey is moving. In Australia, the Monster Mantis, can grow to 15 cm long.

Praying Mantises are carnivorous. They eat many types of insects. Their diet includes grasshoppers, caterpillars, moths, beetles, and occasionally small lizards, snakes, and birds! Praying mantises are found on every continent of the world, but they are most commonly found in tropical regions.

They thrive in areas with mild winters and sunny weather. This includes rainforests, grasslands, meadows, and even deserts. Mantises are masters of camouflage! This helps them escape predators and attract prey at the same time. Mantises found in grasslands and forests are usually green, or lime green, while those in drier regions are brown-colored.
