Parts of a Kangaroo

Kangaroos have large, jointed ears that can rotate independently to pick up sounds from different directions.

Kangaroos have large eyes. They are well adapted for twilight conditions, allowing them to see well at dawn and dusk.

The snout is the projecting part of a kangaroo's face, including the nose and mouth. The snout contains whisker sheaths that help kangaroos detect objects and navigate their environment.

The pouch is a fold of skin on the abdomen of female kangaroos where they carry and nurse their young. Young stay in the pouch for about six months before venturing out, but they continue to nurse from the pouch for several more months.

The front paws are the forelimbs of a kangaroo. The hind legs are the powerful, elongated limbs at the rear of a kangaroo, which allow them to hop at speeds of up to 35 miles per hour. Kangaroos have strong claws on their front and hind legs, which they use for digging, grooming, and defense.

The tail acts as a balance rod when hopping and as a support when sitting or standing.
