Background

As the number of people with chronic health conditions increases, the need for chronic disease management (CDM) programs grows. CDM programs are designed to help people with chronic health conditions manage their health and prevent complications. CDM programs can be delivered in a variety of ways, including through primary care providers, community health workers, and self-management education (SME) programs. SME programs are designed to help people with chronic health conditions learn how to manage their health and prevent complications. SME programs can be delivered in a variety of ways, including through group sessions, individual sessions, and self-paced programs. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness of a self-paced SME program for people with type 2 diabetes.

Methods

This study was a randomized controlled trial. Participants were recruited from a community health center and a local newspaper. Participants were randomized to either the intervention group or the control group. The intervention group received a self-paced SME program, and the control group received standard care. The primary outcome was the change in hemoglobin A1c (HbA1c) levels from baseline to 12 weeks. Secondary outcomes included changes in blood pressure, cholesterol levels, and health-related quality of life (HRQL).

Results

At baseline, the mean HbA1c level was 8.5% in the intervention group and 8.6% in the control group. At 12 weeks, the mean HbA1c level was 7.8% in the intervention group and 8.4% in the control group. The difference in HbA1c levels between the intervention and control groups was statistically significant ( $p < 0.05$ ). There were no significant differences between the intervention and control groups for blood pressure, cholesterol levels, or HRQL.

Conclusions

This study found that a self-paced SME program was effective in reducing HbA1c levels in people with type 2 diabetes. The program was also found to be acceptable and feasible for people with type 2 diabetes. These findings suggest that self-paced SME programs may be a valuable tool for managing chronic health conditions.
