The goals of this study were to model one conceptually oriented teacher s images of systems of ideas and how they develop determine the stability of conceptually and calculationally oriented teaching practices and determine what conceptually and calculationally oriented teachers believe value and understand with respect to mathematics and mathematics teaching The answers to these questions involve a better understanding of teachers orientations towards mathematics teaching One conceptually oriented teacher Mark and one calculationally oriented teacher David were interviewed observed and videotaped over the course of a semester They both taught a mathematics course to prospective elementary teachers In every classroom episode analyzed Mark had a unifying idea in mathematics in mind that he wanted the students to understand That understanding included the ability to connect the unifying idea to a other mathematical concepts b mathematical procedures and c the ways that students made sense of the unifying idea other mathematical concepts and mathematical procedures These ideas and the network that relates these ideas together represent the system of ideas Mark wanted his students to develop Mark s image of how students come to develop a system of ideas compelled him to expect students to share their thinking focus on aspects of a student s thinking that were connected to the unifying idea in the system focus on the quantities in the problem rather than the values of the quantities use diagrams and explanations to help make explicit both students reasonings and the connections among each other s ways of reasoning and make their thinking about their own and each other s thinking about the mathematics an object of conversation Although Mark intended the students develop various systems of ideas throughout the semester his fundamental image of how students develop a system of ideas remained constant Over the course of the study Mark s conceptual orientation and David s calculational orientation remained stable both within and between the teaching of different mathematical topics Both instructors beliefs and understanding about mathematics influenced their orientations toward mathematics teaching
