Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of a 1000-m swim time trial. The subjects were 10 male triathletes who were selected on the basis of their previous performance in a 1000-m swim time trial. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group and a training group. The control group did not participate in any training program, while the training group participated in a 12-week training program. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The first session was a warm-up, the second session was a technical drill, and the third session was a swim time trial. The subjects in the training group were also given a 1000-m swim time trial at the end of the 12-week training program. The results of the study showed that the subjects in the training group had a significantly faster 1000-m swim time trial compared to the subjects in the control group. The mean 1000-m swim time trial for the control group was 18:45, while the mean 1000-m swim time trial for the training group was 17:45. The difference between the two groups was statistically significant ($p < 0.05$). The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the performance of a 1000-m swim time trial.

There is a growing body of evidence that the use of a computer-based system for the management of patient care can improve the quality of care and reduce the risk of error. The system should be designed to support the clinical workflow and to provide a clear and concise interface for the user. The system should also be able to handle a large volume of data and to provide a secure environment for the storage and retrieval of information. The system should be able to integrate with other systems and to provide a single point of access for all the data.
