Summary

The clinical case report is a popular genre in medical writing. While authors and editors have debated the justification for the clinical case report, few have attempted to examine the long history of this genre in medical literature. By reviewing selected literature and presenting and discussing excerpts of clinical case reports from Egyptian antiquity to the 20th century, we illustrate the presence of the genre in medical science and how its form developed. Central features of the clinical case report in different time periods are discussed, including its main components, structure, style and author presence.

Keywords

clinical case report, Galen, genre, Hippocrates, medical history

Background

Medical writing comes in various forms.¹ The clinical case report has for millennia been a hard-wearing species among the different genres in medical literature. In the second half of the 20th century its significance as a type of research article was downgraded due to new and more advanced methods of medical research. It was given a low ranking on the evidence hierarchy. Some feared its extinction.² However, it still seems to be thriving.³ An understanding of medicine can be enhanced by studying its history. The aim of this study is to describe the development and some of the vicissitudes of the clinical case report genre in a historical perspective, from Egyptian antiquity to the 20th century.

Methods

PubMed and Google Scholar were searched using the terms 'medical/clinical case report/s', 'medical/clinical case series report/s', 'case study/-ies', in combination with 'history of medicine', 'medical history', the designation of the various historical ages ('Greek antiquity', 'The Middle Ages', 'Medieval', etc.), 'anecdotal', 'review'. We identified further references from those found in the relevant electronic searches. Also, some textbooks of medical history and electronic internet-based library compilations of original medical writings (e.g. Hippocrates, Galen) were consulted. Finally, we did a subjective selection of sources before structuring and writing this review.

Select illustrative cases

Probably the oldest example of preserved medical literature containing clinical cases is a text from an Egyptian antiquity papyrus.⁴ The Edwin Smith Papyrus dates from the 16th to 17th dynasty, circa 1600 BC, but was probably rewritten from texts some centuries before that time. Among these there are 48 cases discussing injuries or disorders of the head and upper torso. In the title of each of them there is a word that denotes 'knowledge gained from practical experience'. These are not individual case histories but typical ones. One of the cases reads as follows:⁴

CASE 25. A DISLOCATED JAWBONE (9, 2-6) TITLE

Practices for a dislocation in his jaw.

EXAMINATION AND PROGNOSIS

If you treat a man with a dislocation in his jaw, and you find his mouth open and unable to close, you have to put your thumb under the end of the rami of the jaw inside his mouth, with your two forefingers under his chin. Then you push them into their place. Then you say about him: "One who has a dislocation of his jaw: an ailment I will handle."

TREATMENT

You have to bandage him with alum and honey every day until he gets well.

Apart from the bandaging with alum and honey, this is in essence the same maneuver that a skilled doctor will employ today. Physicians were trained in both
