

Role of Managerial Accounting and Management Accountants in an Organization

To arrive at an appropriate decision, it is important for decision makers to have a realistic prediction of deals, outlays, cash flows, and procurement net margins among other costs. With such forecasts, Porteous and Tapadar (2005) assert that managers make important decisions concerning the future of an organization, including, "decisions on the level of employment, investment, salaries, sales, stock levels, debtors and creditors, and overdraft requirements among others"(p.72).

Indeed, management accounting is responsible for making such forecasts. Accounting management professionals act as strategic partners with the organizations they serve (Sebastian, 2000). They also act as risk management partners. Risk management entails developing practices and frameworks for risk documentation, quantification, risk alleviation, and reporting in the attempt to attain organizational objectives and goals (Sharman, 2003).

As performance managers, management accountants focus on the development of business decisions, which make it possible to increase an organization's performance.

Ethical Issues/Concerns in Managerial Accounting

Management accountants have the responsibility to observe various ethical issues or concerns in their work. The Institute of Management Accountants prescribes proficiency, concealment, reliability, and believability as key ethical issues of consideration by all financial and accounting managers.

Credibility requires accounting managers to communicate objectively and fairly. They should disclose important information for enhancing users' understanding of reports, recommendations, and comments that are presented to them (Atrill & McLaney, 2007). Integrity encompasses an obligation for refusal to participate or collude in activities that discredit the accounting management profession.

For example, they should not engage in subversion or the realization of ethical objectives and illegitimate goals of an organization. The ethical concern of confidentiality implies the obligation of not disclosing confidential information without authentication from the owners.

Any manager who wants to acquire private information must seek a legal permission to do so. Competence is an aspect that requires accounting managers to perform their duties in compliance with regulations, technical standards, and the relevant laws and regulations that guide the profession.
