

Lab Exercise 38.C: Evidence of Hereditary Material

Some studies have shown that cells of a single bacterial culture, when independently grown, sometimes produce different phenotypes. When these cells are grown together, however, all descendants that form in subsequent generations are indistinguishable from the original population. This is known as phenotypic stability. This stability is not a result of a change in the genetic material, but is a result of a change in the environment.

Control and phenotypic change in bacterial growth.

The following is an abbreviated summary of Griffith's procedure to demonstrate the transformation of bacteria.

Procedure:

1. Prepare two cultures of Streptococcus pneumoniae (S. pneumoniae) in separate test tubes. One culture is grown in a nutrient broth medium, and the other is grown in a nutrient broth medium containing a substance that kills the bacteria (Figure 38.C-2).

Control and phenotypic change in bacterial growth.

2. The bacterial cultures are then mixed and re-inoculated in separate test tubes. The mixture is grown in a nutrient broth medium. The result is a culture that is indistinguishable from the original population (Figure 38.C-3).
