THE FIRST YEAR OF JAMESTOWN

The first year of Jamestown was a time of great hardship for the settlers. They arrived in May 1607, and the first winter was particularly difficult. Many settlers died of disease, and the remaining survivors were often starving. The settlers also faced conflict with the local Native Americans, who were often hostile to the English. The settlers' lack of food and shelter, combined with the harsh weather, made the first year of Jamestown a time of great suffering.

The settlers' lack of food and shelter was a major problem. They had no way of growing food, and they had no way of building shelter. The settlers also faced conflict with the local Native Americans, who were often hostile to the English. The settlers' lack of food and shelter, combined with the harsh weather, made the first year of Jamestown a time of great suffering.

One of the main reasons for the settlers' lack of food and shelter was their lack of planning. They had no way of growing food, and they had no way of building shelter. The settlers also faced conflict with the local Native Americans, who were often hostile to the English. The settlers' lack of food and shelter, combined with the harsh weather, made the first year of Jamestown a time of great suffering.
