

Anthropologist, Edward T. Hall gives emphasis to the part played by CULTURE in nonverbal COMMUNICATION. Similarly, Michael Argyle's Social Psychological research on nonverbal COMMUNICATION focuses on social & cultural contexts. In both disciplines, the human body is the main transmitter of nonverbal codes. As presentational symbols, these include, for example, gesture, eye movement, & qualities of voice. Nonverbal codes serve two functions: (1) to convey indexical information; & (2) interaction management. Argyle lists 10 codes & suggests the sorts of meanings that might be conveyed: Edward T. Hall, The Silent Language, 1973; Michael Argyle, The Psychology of Interpersonal Behaviour, 1972, & Bodily Communication, 1975.

nonverbal communication

1. BODILY CONTACT

Whom we touch; where we touch; & when we touch conveys important messages about relationships. The meanings of touch vary most among people of different cultures.

2. PROXIMITY

How closely we approach sends a message about the relationship. There are Distinctive features: (i) 3 feet is intimate; (ii) up to 8 feet is personal; & (iii) over 8 feet is semi-public. The meanings of proximity vary most among people of different cultures

3. ORIENTATION

How we angle ourselves to others is another way of sending messages about relationships. Consider facing someone vs. being at 90 degree angle.

4. APPEARANCE

Argyle divides appearance into: (1) voluntary control; & (2) less controllable. Voluntary control includes hair, clothes, skin, bodily paint, & adornment; less controllable refers to things like height & weight.

5. FACIAL EXPRESSIONS

Facial expressions can be broken down into the subcodes of eyebrow position, eye shape, mouth shape, & nostril size. In various combinations, the manipulation of facial muscles determines the expression of the face. It is possible to write a 'grammar' of one's facial combinations & meanings. Facial Expressions show less cross-cultural variations than most other codes.

6. HEAD NODS

Head nods mainly infer attempts at interaction management, particularly in turn-taking in speech.

7. GESTURES OR KINESICS

The hand & arm are the main transmitters of gesture; gestures of feet & head are also important. They are closely coordinated with speech & other verbal communication. Gestures mainly indicate general or specific emotion states. Consider the differences between indexical vs. symbolic gestures, like talking with hands vs. giving the finger.

8. POSTURE

Our ways of sitting, standing, or lying communicates a limited but interesting range of meaning, concerned with interpersonal attitudes, like friendliness or hostility.

9. EYE MOVEMENT & EYE CONTACT

When, how often, & for how long we meet other people's eyes is a way of sending very important messages about relationships, particularly how dominant or affiliative we wish the relationship to be.

10. NON-VERBAL ASPECTS OF SPEECH

Argyle differentiates between two categories of the non-verbal elements at play when talking: (i) The Prosodic; & (ii) The Paradigmatic. (i) Prosodic codes like pitch & stress affect the meaning of the words. & (ii) Paradigmatic codes communicate information about the speaker, for example, tone, volume, accent, speech errors, & speed can indicate the speaker's emotional state, personality, class, social status, etc.
