WHY IT IS JUST BONKER TO BAN CONKERS

AN ATTACK ON TRADITIONAL FUN MAKES CHILDHOOD SAFE BUT BORING

FRANK FUREDI

1. When I told a group of academics two years ago that the game of conkers would soon be banned, my remarks were greeted with incredulity and howls of derision. I had just completed a study of the growth of compensation culture in Britain and was struck by the way that the fear of litigation was destroying opportunities for children to play outdoors.
2. Council officials informed me that they faced hundreds of cases involving minor accidents caused to children in playgrounds and other recreational areas. Some local authorities were so worried that they might be sued by parents of children injured conkering, that they had implemented a policy of "tree management" to make horse chestnut trees less accessible to children. When I complained that preventing youngsters from having access to chestnut trees diminished the quality of their childhood experience, I was told: "Blame the lawyers." One personal injury lawyer could not see what the fuss was about. He dismissed my concern with the statement: "Tree management is a sensible policy"
3. Norwich city council has adopted the policy of tree management. Councillors voted to cut down 20 chestnut trees to protect people from head injuries from sticks thrown up to knock down conkers. The council was also worried that squashed conkers on the road could lead to traffic accidents, which in turn could injure children collecting chestnuts. Although there have never been such improbable accidents in Norwich, the council felt it was better to be safe than sorry.
4. When it comes to avoiding litigation, ruining children's fun is a price worth paying for these kill-joy councillors. A recently published survey by Keele University researcher Sarah Thomson indicates that it is not just local authorities which are out to ban conkering. She says that schools are banning traditional playtime games because headteachers are scared of being sued by litigious parents in the event of an accident. In some schools, skipping is not considered to be a safe activity since girls may trip and bruise their knees.
5. Even football has not escaped the attention of busy-body school authorities. Sarah Thomson's survey confirms this trend and she reports that some schools are surreptitiously phasing out football.
6. Games such as British Bulldog, where children attempt to prevent each other from running across the playground, are considered far too robust for today's youngsters and are often banned. It seems that just about any outdoor activity that children find enjoyable
