

Study Guide – Unit 5 – Jacksonian Democracy

Economic Boom

General Info – In the years preceding the Age of Jackson, there was a large economic boom domestically, resulting from a revolution in transportation, that included large-scale investments in Railroads, Canals, and Roads, that helped transport goods. Additionally, the government began subsidizing these projects, and gave land grants that helped to establish these improvements.

Monopolies – In cases such as Gibbons v. Ogden (1824), the Supreme Court bashed Monopolies, and opened up business opportunities to many who previously lacked these chances. To meet this need for a larger labor force to work on these large projects, there became a marked increase in immigration during this period.

Immigration – Many immigrants came to the United States during this period of time, especially the German and Irish, who came to escape hard times in their home countries. Additionally, there was a breakthrough in that it was not just the men who were undertaking this labor, but also the women and children of the families, seeing as there were no child labor laws.

The South During This Period

Cotton – During the time preceding the Age of Jackson, the South was revolutionized by the invention of the Cotton Gin by Eli Whitney in 1793. This enabled the speedy removal of seed from short-staple cotton, a variety of the plant that, although hardier and able to be grown in more places, required much more work to remove the seeds of it.

The Deep South – This invention changed that, and sparked the foundation of a system of plantations throughout the Deep South, churning out short-staple cotton to be refined into textiles in the North in states such as Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia.

The Upper South – However, the Upper South, consisting of states such as Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, began to focus more on other crops, such as corn, that could be sold to the plantations in the Lower South in order to feed the labor force. These states, although they used slavery, were not as heavy players in the plantation system that began to evolve during this time.

Southern Economics – The South found slavery to be a very profitable enterprise during this period, and saw no incentive to change from this
