But again there have been some remarkable exceptions. The great Frenchman Jean-Jacques Rousseau was not of the Anglo-American strain. Rousseau's unique thinking, viewing all the questions of society, truth, and the good of humanity, culminated in the important concept of the "general will." This led him to the idea of the "social contract" whereby all citizens and representatives consent. This is important and reflected by Rousseau's own fact that he himself was always with a skeptical posture. Rousseau's efforts grew quickly by continued effort towards the end of his life.

Macmillan stressed his own "high-sounding" character as another selling point for the sphere, emphasizing that it was "fully actually improved" Macmillan wrote the Illustrated Catalogue of Maps from the 1890s with the biggest sphere incorporated into the design. Macmillan not only presented the sphere but also the map itself: "I am certain that there is no globe that is so perfect in its construction, it is so well made, that it is so light, with great strength, as this sphere, being as the most correct in its design" (p. 183, 1893, 1894). Macmillan wrote on the back of the globe, "The sphere is the most perfect in its construction, it is so well made, that it is so light, with great strength, as this sphere, being as the most correct in its design" (p. 183, 1893, 1894).
