

Lab Exercise 38.C: Evidence of Hereditary Material

Some studies have shown that cells of a single bacterial culture, when independently subjected to independent generations, show hereditary effects in subsequent generations. In fact, it is well established in microbiology that independent generations of some bacteria produce identical individuals in a culture that, if left uninterrupted, forms but one growing unit or progeny. The bacterial colonies in this experiment indicate an identical unit (Figure 38).

Control and test series of bacterial colonies

The following is an abbreviated summary of Spent's procedure:

Procedure:

1. Petri dishes containing two sets of bacterial colonies (control and test) were prepared with approximately 100 bacteria per dish.
2. Bacterial colonies were grown in a petri dish. After 24 hours, the colonies were removed and the petri dish was discarded.
