Abstract

For these results, we have used a log-linear model, which assumes that the relationship between the log of the dependent variable and the log of the independent variable is linear. This is a common assumption in the literature, and it is often used to estimate the elasticity of a variable with respect to another variable. The results show that the elasticity of the dependent variable with respect to the independent variable is positive and significant at the 1% level. This suggests that a 1% increase in the independent variable leads to a positive and significant increase in the dependent variable. The results also show that the elasticity of the dependent variable with respect to the control variables is negative and significant at the 1% level. This suggests that a 1% increase in the control variables leads to a negative and significant decrease in the dependent variable. The results are robust to a variety of alternative specifications, including the use of different functional forms, the inclusion of additional control variables, and the use of different estimation methods. The results are also robust to the use of different samples, including the use of the full sample and the use of subsamples. The results are also robust to the use of different time periods, including the use of the full time period and the use of subsamples. The results are also robust to the use of different countries, including the use of the full set of countries and the use of subsamples.
