- Background. The selection of hardware for the design and construction phase of weapons systems and equipment and the analysis of hardware cost factors for parameters, such as maintainability, modifiability, and compatibility, requires the evaluation and construction of test data and criteria. In conducting these functions, it has become increasingly evident that the data and criteria required from prime contractors, hardware producers, private researchers, military commands, and military departments cannot be adequately composed. The chief reason for this is the absence of unified standards prescribing test methods, procedures, hardware, data analysis, and data presentation. This disparity encourages and often requires duplication of testing and reduces reliability of weapons systems and equipment, thereby increasing operations involving engineering talent, design documentation, quality assurance, modifiability, and logistic supportability. To correct this situation it was determined that a unified set of test methods and procedures is required to serve as a basic engineering tool for acquiring and presenting engineering data. As a result, this document was developed and prepared to satisfy this vital need. This standard describes standard test methods, procedures, conditions, hardware, and methods of recording, analyzing and presenting test data. The purpose of this resulting test data is to determine the capability of hardware to withstand the various environmental and mechanical conditions encountered when used in military weapons systems.
- Benefits. Many benefits are to be expected by unified standard tests for hardware. The following is a list of benefits that can be expected to accrue from using this standard:
1. Availability of testing techniques and criteria necessary for the design and development of increasingly complex structural hardware. In the past, when a new hardware test needed to solve a problem, the necessary test procedures had to be developed and written; also, the necessary hardware had to be designed. This always imposed delays, additional expenses, variations in test methods and in test results.
 2. Increasing confidence of correlation among hardware test data and design engineering techniques and design criteria for weapons systems and equipment. As new systems are designed to achieve higher performance for a given volume and mass of material, it is essential that design data for structural parts (a larger portion of weight is obtained by testing hardware) maintain a close correlation with engineering techniques and design criteria. Without weight-in engineering, such as in aircraft structures, such close comparison will provide a substantial reduction in weight.
 3. Availability of testing techniques and criteria necessary to improve consistent quality in the procurement of hardware.
 4. Reduction in the time and effort required for the development of procurement specifications for hardware by having a review of standard tests available.
 5. Elimination of duplication in the development of test methods and documents by individual hardware producers, Government contractors, and military activities.
