Abstract: Staphylococcus aureus strains isolated from patients with skin infections in a tertiary care hospital in the north of Chile were analyzed by pulsed-field gel electrophoresis (PFGE) to determine the prevalence of different strains and to identify risk factors for colonization. The strains were grouped into 10 different PFGE patterns. The prevalence of strains was 100% for the 100% of the patients. The results suggest that the strains of S. aureus isolated from patients with skin infections in the north of Chile are highly diverse and that the colonization of the strains is not related to the hospital environment.

(Other people, including practitioners in the field, have not yet done this) and the authors argue that the literature on the importance of a positive image for SMEs (e.g. Perrenson and Lund 1992) is somewhat less relevant for entrepreneurs due to their self-referential and somewhat arbitrary definition of a positive image. In the literature on SMEs, however, it is generally accepted that SMEs are important to the development of the local economy (e.g. the Small Business 1999), and it is often suggested that SMEs are important to the development of the local economy (e.g. the Small Business 1999).
