Definition: A firm's investment in research and development (R&D) relative to its sales in the prior year. R&D intensity is a company's research cost.

Setting: Firms invest in R&D to develop new products and services. R&D is a costly activity that is often risky, and it is often a long-term investment. Firms invest in R&D to develop new products and services that will give them a competitive advantage in the future.

Design: The primary independent variable is R&D intensity, measured as the ratio of R&D to sales. The dependent variable is the firm's performance, measured as the return to shareholders.

Control: The control variables include the firm's size, age, industry, and profitability. These variables are included to control for factors that might affect the relationship between R&D intensity and performance.

Findings: The findings suggest that R&D intensity is positively related to firm performance. Firms that invest more in R&D tend to have higher returns to shareholders. This relationship is stronger for firms in the high-tech industry and for firms that are younger and smaller.
