

Refraction B2—When Is Light Reflected Internally? Teacher's Notes

The Approved Online Teachers Guide includes information about objectives, materials, setup, introduction, and discussion. The B2 lab includes background information, materials, setup, student worksheets, an experiment, discussion and answer key.

This activity is designed for use in high school or college physics courses. It encompasses phenomena included and students are invited to have an understanding of basic geometric and trigonometric. The Teacher Guide, which includes an answer key, includes content questions/answers, student worksheets, and a student answer key.

Educational Objectives

- Students will recognize that a discrete source of the boundary (surface) between two transparent materials.
- Students will be able to discover that the angle of reflection when light passes from plastic to air is larger than the angle of incidence.
- Students will discover that there is a angle of incidence (when the light ray is passing from plastic to air) at which reflected ray is not totally internally. This phenomenon is called total internal reflection.

Key Question

- As the path of light moves from plastic (angle of incidence) to air (angle of reflection) are all angles of light reflected or is there a limiting angle of incidence or less?
 - If incident light the all angles are not reflected what is the smallest angle that is not reflected?
 - What happens to the incident light?

Concept Overview

Light is reflected and moves from plastic to air. However, the angle of reflection (the light in the air) is larger than the angle of incidence (the light in the plastic). The angle of reflection will increase as the angle of incidence increases or vice versa. The reflected angle will reach 90° before the angle of incidence does. That critical angle is called the critical angle when the reflected angle is 90° . If the incident angle is greater than the critical angle, all the light will be reflected at the plastic/air interface. Thus students will observe that some light is reflected and some is refracted when the incident angle is less than the critical angle. But, all light will be reflected when the incident angle is greater than the critical angle.

Techniques

The plastic half-circular block has been set up on the student page so that light enters the plastic half-circular block from the small side of the plastic block. In this configuration, the light is always entering the plastic block along a normal to the surface, is refracted (bent) as it goes at the point. The light will follow a curve through the block to point "C" where it exits the plastic block into air and is reflected.
