

Chapter 11: Lifespan Development

Developmental Psychology

Focuses on the physiological, cognitive and social changes that occur in individuals across the lifespan

Why are babies so helpless?

- Instead of our brain being preprogrammed, we are sponges that absorb all sorts of information and tendencies
- Although we have things that we are able to do as we are born, those are also based on our experiences and incoming information

Methods in Development

- Preferential looking technique → setting up two competing stimulus and seeing which one is being looked at more
- Habituation/Orienting Reflex → young children will look at an object and get bored very easily, do they habituate looking at something

What does it mean to develop

Nature and Nurture Intertwined

- Underlying DNA that makes up our genes gets turned on and off by surrounding chemical tags
- Epigenetic influences accumulate over the life span

Continuity or Discontinuity

- Whether development proceeds gradually and smoothly over time or changes from one stage to the next

Universal or Ecological Development

- The universal approach to development looks for age related behaviors found across human species
- Ecological is about the impact of culture and environment on development

How does Cognition Change during Infancy and Adulthood

Jean Piaget's Theory of Cognitive Development

According to piaget's theory cognitive abilities develop through regular stages, making piaget's work a classic example of discontinuity approach, cognition matures as children increasingly use concepts and organizing schemas

- Adjustments that can be made to a schema depending on the nature of discrepancies between the new info and existing category
 1. Assimilation ; no changes to existing schema are required to add the new instance
 - When our existing schemas no longer provide a sufficient match to reality, we experience disequilibrium and develop more complex schemas
 2. Accommodation ; schema must be adapted to fit the new info
 - Child now understands exception and nuance
