

The Lewis and Clark Expedition Across Missouri

On the morning of June 14, 1804, the expedition passed the site of present-day Glasgow. The party was very close to the mouth of the Missouri and they were fighting with currents and floating debris from the rain that had been falling for the last two days. As we pass the expedition passed a part of the river where the banks were falling in taking large cutbanks over with them. But the crew was not getting more accustomed to dealing with the treacherous river. Following our particularly perilous encounter on June 9, our pilot's Richard Cook, Capt. William Clark wrote in his journal: "I can say with confidence that our party is not inferior to any that was ever on the waters of the Missouri."

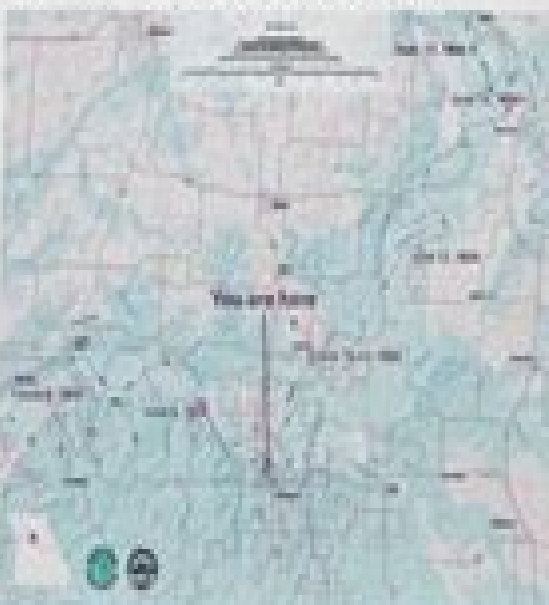

William Clark, Journal, 1804

On June 15, 1804, the Lewis and Clark Expedition passed the site of present-day Glasgow. The party was very close to the mouth of the Missouri and they were fighting with currents and floating debris from the rain that had been falling for the last two days. As we pass the expedition passed a part of the river where the banks were falling in taking large cutbanks over with them. But the crew was not getting more accustomed to dealing with the treacherous river. Following our particularly perilous encounter on June 9, our pilot's Richard Cook, Capt. William Clark wrote in his journal: "I can say with confidence that our party is not inferior to any that was ever on the waters of the Missouri."

When the lower site of Glasgow, the expedition encountered the two "Chaletons" (Chaleton River). Clark knew that the Big Chaleton River could be navigated by passing for a great distance and that the river's headwaters were near those of the Big Missouri River on which the Lewis Indians lived. As the river is a major confluence, the expedition halted for an hour and a half while Capt. Meriwether Lewis made several observations with his scientific instruments.

Not far above this confluence, the expedition halted at an island and noted for the Indians on shore to arrive. While there, the men were plagued by waves of mosquitoes. When the Indians arrived, the British women appeared against a will current. They passed a large island Clark called "Blosser" or "Blosser" (the phonetic rendering of the French word flower meaning stumps), and then pulled ashore at a point on the left-hand (southern) side and set up camp. The exhausting struggle against the swift currents of the Missouri, the constant rain, and the swarms of insects did not dampen the morale of the Corps of Discovery. Clark concluded his journal entry for June 15 by writing, "the morning is cloudy, our party is high spirits."

THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION ENCOUNTERED THE MISSOURI

By the time the expedition passed present-day Glasgow, it was being pelted by heavier rain and some of the men were sickened and starting to experience symptoms. The heat is complete on the banks of a river that was slowly described by William Clark. Clark called the river white and "thick" the water composed of good land and plenty of water rising it accompanied with great of natural heat. These factors are not unique. The flow, as a member of the Corps, or the Missouri had of more things through grass they should with

With such a river frequently Clark and the other members of the expedition knew of the beauty and beauty of the present day was encountering
