18. Suppose that the population of all Americans's incomes was just $100,000,000,000. This time, John Doe-Lee, a business school mathematics teacher, randomly selected the names of 100,000,000,000 Americans and asked each person's income. His sample statistic, calculated as the mean of the incomes, will give the correct but unrepresentative estimate of the population's income. To suggest a better way to get a more accurate estimate, suppose that 1,000 of the 100,000,000,000 Americans were selected and their incomes were recorded. Suppose that the mean of these 1,000 incomes was $100,000,000,000.000. This sample mean will give a better estimate of the population's income than the sample mean calculated from the 100,000,000,000 incomes.
