

Standard level internal assessment

The range and suitability of the work submitted

A greater variety of topics were seen this session. However, as in previous sessions many of the explorations were of the correlation type using PMCC, χ^2 test for independence or goodness of fit test. There were more explorations using the two-sample t-test in this session. A greater percentage of students also applied modelling and calculus with varying degrees of success. A few students attempted mathematics above or outside the SL syllabus. These were seldom successful as the students were unable to show evidence of understanding the chosen processes.

There were still explorations seen where the students would give an introduction, some contrived reason for interest, a plan that is sometimes not justified at the beginning and not always adhered to, followed by a mechanical application of textbook type processes irrespective of the relevance in context. This was most evident in the statistics-based explorations where the students failed to provide a thorough description of the sampling technique and process and neglected to justify the sample size. The students often failed to establish the relevance to the aim of many of the processes applied. Most of these explorations included comments about the need for more data without considering the strengths and limitations of their initial sampling technique and whether this resulted in a representative sample of the population.

A greater number of modelling type explorations were seen. Some more successful than others. Students either found the models manually or used technology, either approach being acceptable.

There seemed to be less explorations using the application of Voronoi diagrams. Some explorations on the probability of winning in games such as Monopoly and Backgammon were noted. There were few explorations seen on topics such as Geometry and Finance.

It was noted that in some schools all students' work seemed to follow the same procedure and style where each student looked at different variables to compare which limited the scope for personal engagement as well as reflection.

Most of the work submitted used mathematics commensurate with the course, there were however exceptions that either included mathematics beyond or entirely from the prior knowledge sections: these did not score well overall.

Student performance against each criterion

Criterion A

An overall improvement was noticed in that students now place lengthy tables of data and/or calculations in the appendix and as well as refer and comment on graphs/diagrams/tables when introduced.

Unfortunately, there still are some persistent issues such as: an unclear aim/title or an aim which is slightly different from the title which was confusing (to the student and the reader); including processes irrelevant to the aim just for the sake of having "more mathematics"; stating a plan and then not following the plan. This plan also sometimes presumed outcomes that were yet to be determined which affected coherence.

In some explorations there were many titles and subtitles without linking the sections through explanations and reasons for performing the processes. This affected coherence as well as organization.
