

Short report

The Problem Behaviour Checklist: short scale to assess challenging behaviours

Peter Tyrer, Jessica Nagar, Rosie Evans, Patricia Oliver, Paul Bassett, Natalie Liedtka and Aris Tarabi

Background

Challenging behaviour, especially in intellectual disability, covers a wide range that is in need of further evaluation.

Aims

To develop a short but comprehensive instrument for all aspects of challenging behaviour.

Method

In the first part of a two-stage enquiry, a 28-item scale was constructed to examine the components of challenging behaviour. Following a simple factor analysis this was developed further to create a new short scale, the Problem Behaviour Checklist (PBCl). The scale was subsequently used in a randomised controlled trial and tested for inter-rater reliability. Scores were also compared with a standard scale, the Modified Overt Aggression Scale (MOAS).

Results

Seven identified factors – personal violence, violence against property, self-harm, sexually inappropriate, contrary, demanding and disappearing behaviour – were scored on a 5-point scale. A subsequent factor analysis with the second population showed demanding, violent and contrary behaviour to account for most of the variance. Inter-rater reliability using weighted kappa showed good agreement (0.91; 95% CI 0.83–0.99). Good agreement was also shown with scores on the MOAS and a score of 1 on the PBCl showed high sensitivity (97%) and specificity (85%) for a threshold MOAS score of 4.

Conclusions

The PBCl appears to be a suitable and practical scale for assessing all aspects of challenging behaviour.

There is increasing concern about problem behaviours in many forms of psychiatric care, and research has been handicapped by the absence of formal incorporation of these behaviours into diagnostic systems. Although there are several instruments that record these features,¹ many have poor internal consistency and reliability or only assess one component of challenging behaviour, and others with much better psychometric properties such as the Aberrant Behaviour Checklist² are a little long and not ideal for repeat assessments. We describe the development of a seven-item 5-point scale, the Problem Behaviour Checklist (PBCl), and tested its reliability and utility in practice.

Problem behaviours, mainly in people with intellectual disability, cover a wide range of disturbance, are a source of considerable distress to hospital staff and carers^{3,4} and are often expensive to manage in practice, especially at more severe levels.⁵ Assessment is handicapped by the absence of a satisfactory diagnostic system for recording challenging behaviour and the overlap with existing diagnoses such as personality and mood disorders.⁶ Thus, although the prevalence of challenging behaviours is higher than any formal diagnostic group,⁷ the fact that it is not recognised diagnostically makes it even more important for it to be reliably and consistently assessed. In the course of research into interventions for these problems, we recognised the need to examine the full range of behaviours reported as challenging and felt that these could be condensed into a much shorter instrument.

MethodParticipants

During a randomised trial on the management of aggressive challenging behaviour⁸ it was observed that some forms of challenging behaviour apparently independent of aggression were not identified and these were noted. We subsequently attempted to encompass the range of all potential behaviours suitable for inclusion by close examination of two international comprehensive descriptions.^{9,10} Two studies were then involved in testing the scale. In the first, a field study was carried out for the World Health Organisation on personality status and aggressive challenging behaviour in patients with intellectual disability in Jamaica.¹¹ The participant population was selected from a specialist intellectual disability high school (School of Hope), a supported care home and an adult day centre for people with intellectual disabilities, all operated by the Jamaican Association on Intellectual Disabilities (JAID) in Kingston, Jamaica.

In the second study, linked to a trial of nifedipine (details available from the author on request) in the treatment of challenging behaviour in 200 residents in care homes, the same list of behaviours was recorded for all residents at monthly intervals over the course of at least 1 year. The projects were ethically approved by the JAID and North West Wales Research Ethics Committee (10/WYN001/1).

Statistical analysis

Each of the possible challenging behaviours were scored using a 4-point scale. A key aim of the analysis was to understand the associations between the different behaviours, and factor analysis was the main tool of investigation, using a standard Varimax rotation. An individual's behaviour was considered to be associated with each factor if the factor loadings for that variable were greater than 0.5. Separate factor analyses were performed for each of the two data-sets. The scale, called the PBCl, was created after the first analysis.
