Embedding Questions National Research Council, Division of Behavioral and Social Sciences and Education, Board on Testing and Assessment, Committee on Embedding Common Test Items in State and District Assessments, 1999-11-17 Policy makers are caught between two powerful forces in relation to testing in American schools One is increased interest on the part of educators reinforced by federal requirements in developing tests that accurately reflect local educational standards and goals The other is a strong push to gather information about the performance of students and schools relative to national and international standards and norms The difficulty of achieving these two goals simultaneously is exacerbated by both the long standing American tradition of local control of education and the growing public sentiment that students already take enough tests Finding a solution to this dilemma has been the focus of numerous debates surrounding the Voluntary National Tests proposed by President Clinton in his 1997 State of the Union address It was also the topic of a congressionally mandated 1998 National Research Council report Uncommon Measures Equivalence and Linkage Among Educational Tests and was touched upon in a U S General Accounting Office report Student Testing Issues Related to Voluntary National Mathematics and Reading Tests More recently Congress asked the National Research Council to determine the technical feasibility validity and reliability of embedding test items from the National Assessment of Educational Progress or other tests in state and district assessments in 4th grade reading and 8th grade mathematics for the purpose of developing a valid measure of student achievement within states and districts and in terms of national performance standards or scales This report is the response to that congressional mandate

Implementing Speed Drills to Improve Student Scores on Math Computation Standardized Tests Emily S. Phillips, 2018

This study sought to investigate the effectiveness of implementing regular speed drills in a math classroom to improve student scores on math computation tests Three questions are investigated 1 Are there significant differences in student achievement on timed math computation tests between the conceptual classical curriculum with typical homework practice at the end of class and the same curriculum with speed drills implemented at the end of class twice per week 2 Is there a difference between male and female performance on the timed math computation tests before and after the speed drill intervention 3 Is there a difference between the performance of different grade levels on the timed math computation tests before and after the speed drill intervention The research was performed in a private classical middle school using 17 students of a single teacher over the course of 10 weeks The data were collected in the form of 5 different test scores and the results were analyzed using dependent paired sample t tests The results suggest a significant improvement in test scores after the speed drill intervention The claim that it was the speed drills alone that resulted in higher achievement however cannot be substantiated Due to the repeated measures design it is more likely that the continual practice with the math computation tests produced confidence and strategies that enhanced student performance in addition to the speed drill element More studies should be done in the future in public schools and using independent measures design to preserve validity and allow for generalization Keywords math computation standardized tests speed drills fluency automaticity middle school math conceptual instruction classical education
