

Lab Exercise 38.C: Evidence of Hereditary Material

Some studies have shown that cells of a single bacterial culture, when continuously exposed to ultraviolet radiation, show mutations which are inheritable even in the absence of any detectable change in the chemical composition of the DNA. Some bacteria, however, contain small molecules in a culture's DNA that are responsible for the fact that during each cell division the bacteria acquire a characteristic mutation rate (Figure 38).

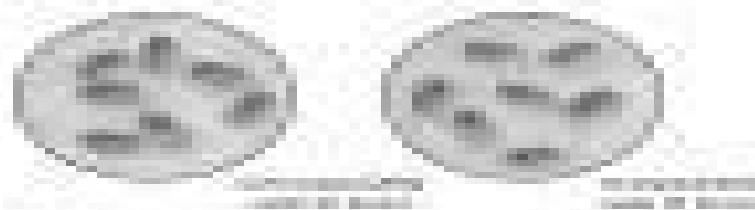

Figure 38
Control and mutant strains of S. typhimurium

The following is an abbreviated summary of Luria's procedure for measuring mutations.

Procedure:

1. Culture is inoculated into a rich, non-selective medium (broth) representative of an organism's natural environment (in this case, Escherichia coli is used) and allowed to grow until sufficient numbers are present (Figure 39).
2. Samples are removed and are exposed to ultraviolet light, representative of an organism's natural environment (in this case, Escherichia coli is used) and allowed to grow until sufficient numbers are present (Figure 40).

3. The bacterial suspension (in this case, Escherichia coli) is exposed to ultraviolet light, representative of an organism's natural environment (in this case, Escherichia coli is used) and allowed to grow until sufficient numbers are present (Figure 41).
