

Introduction

From the latter part of the 1980s economic scholars engaged in a gender-specific critical point of view have generated large volumes of work that analytically examines macroeconomic theory and practice, its policy implications, and its gender-specific effects. A large part of the literature on gender equality and macroeconomics belongs to broader attempt to build "a more humane economics centered around the provisioning of human needs rather than around the notions of scarcity, efficiency and maximization of economic growth without a human purpose" (Gutiérrez, 2003, 3).

There is currently a massive number of empirical findings and theoretical explanations that show major connections between gender inequalities and too much time demands or pressure on women and opportunities for economic development. This paper analyzes gender inequality in macroeconomics, particularly in relation to the concept of 'social reproduction' and 'gender budgeting'. This paper argues that a gender-sensitive macroeconomic policy is possible only if social reproduction and gender budgeting are taken into serious consideration.

Overview

Specifically, gender inequalities are viewed to be not just adverse for women, but also restraints to growth and progress. As stated by Elson and colleagues (1997), "Constraints can be seen as hampering the smooth interaction of the different dimensions of the economy, creating disabling rather than enabling environments, and preventing the outcome of the international and national policy and of individual decisions adding up to sustainable, well balanced development"
