The purpose of this study is to investigate the impact of social media on the mental health of young adults. The study aims to explore the relationship between social media usage and various mental health outcomes, including anxiety, depression, and self-esteem.	The study is based on a cross-sectional design, involving a survey of 1,000 young adults aged 18-25. The data was collected through an online questionnaire, which was distributed via social media platforms and email. The questionnaire included a series of validated scales to measure social media usage, mental health symptoms, and demographic factors.	The data was analyzed using SPSS 25.0. Descriptive statistics were used to summarize the sample characteristics and the distribution of variables. Pearson's correlation coefficient was used to examine the relationship between social media usage and mental health outcomes. Multiple regression analysis was conducted to control for confounding variables and to identify the independent effect of social media usage on mental health.	The results of the study indicate a positive correlation between social media usage and mental health symptoms. Specifically, higher levels of social media usage were associated with increased levels of anxiety and depression, and decreased levels of self-esteem. These findings suggest that excessive social media use may have a detrimental impact on the mental health of young adults.	The study concludes that social media usage is a significant factor in the development of mental health symptoms among young adults. The findings have important implications for mental health professionals and policymakers, who should consider the role of social media in mental health interventions and public health strategies. Further research is needed to explore the underlying mechanisms of this relationship and to develop effective interventions to mitigate the negative effects of social media on mental health.
