Empirical analysis shows that the data delivers strong evidence to reject this idea Instead I develop a new way of interpreting the meaning of special knowledge by asking what advantage a politician has to socialise with lobbyists By focusing this question in more detail a theoretical model is introduced which shows how important the concerns of special interest groups could be for politicians in their aim to become reelected This model leads to the final result of this paper What makes lobbyists useful to politicians and therewith powerful is the provision of private information about preferences of possibly pivotal constituents
