1. Identify the components: The first step is to identify the components of the system. This includes the hardware, software, and data. For example, a system might consist of a computer, a network, and a database.

Figures 1 and 2 show multiphase water flow curves spring from long-term values of permeability as function of time. It shows that permeability increases with time, resulting from the removal of residual stresses during early life cycle. The drainage technique around the central circumference and bottom formed stress-free surfaces at that time.

Although both types of models suggest a similar overall picture, I believe the first model, which views the firm as a homogeneous unit, is more plausible. First, the marketing research suggests that the socializing of new hires is a very important factor in a firm's performance, and it is plausible that groups of new hires engage in socialization activities. Second, the group of new hires is likely to be a homogeneous unit, especially if the group is small.
