

Chapters 1-3: Introduction and the Core Sites

Chapter 1-3: Overall ecological context (the experimental design) and how/why/when?

1. In the 1980s, the dominant view of the implementation of genetic control (biocontrol) was that it was a "one-time" event. The implementation of biocontrol was a single act, and the only way to control the pest was to "release" the biocontrol agent. This view was based on the idea that the biocontrol agent would establish itself and control the pest. However, the implementation of biocontrol is a more complex process. It involves the release of the biocontrol agent, the establishment of the agent, and the control of the pest. The implementation of biocontrol is a process that can take years or even decades. It is a process that involves many steps, from the selection of the biocontrol agent to the release of the agent and the monitoring of the pest. The implementation of biocontrol is a process that is often misunderstood. It is a process that is often seen as a "one-time" event, but it is actually a long-term process. 2. One of the major issues in the implementation of biocontrol is the selection of the biocontrol agent. The selection of the biocontrol agent is a critical step in the process. It is a step that involves the selection of an agent that is specific to the pest and that is unlikely to harm non-target species. The selection of the biocontrol agent is a step that is often overlooked. It is a step that is often seen as a "one-time" event, but it is actually a long-term process.
