Kempf, 2020-01-20 Migrant children separated from their parents A scheme to defraud Cook County using property tax breaks An undisclosed thirty year business relationship between city officials in Baltimore These are the sorts of headlines regularly generated by offices of inspector general OIGs bureaucratic units dedicated to government accountability that are commonly independent of the agencies they are charged with overseeing In 1976 OIGs were virtually unheard of and were largely at the federal level but today there are more than 170 OIGs overseeing state and local government entities Why have OIGs been so widely adopted and what do they do How do they contribute to accountability and what are their limitations In The Power of Accountability Robin J Kempf sets out to address these questions with empirical data and to examine the conflicts that have led to variations in the design and implementation of OIGs In doing so she explores the power of the concept of the inspector general an institutional model for keeping subnational government units accountable to the public As more and more government entities have created offices of inspector general practitioners in this developing field have recommended an archetypal structure for these agencies that assures their authority and independence Why then The Power of Accountability asks have so many states and localities incorporated significant deviations from this recommended model in their design Through an extensive review of government websites laws and ordinances original surveys of the identified OIGs legislative histories and interviews with thirty eight OIG staff in eight states Kempf analyzes why OIGs have proliferated why and how they work differently in various jurisdictions and what effect these variations in design have on the effectiveness of OIGs as a mechanism of accountability The ever expanding call for accountability in government drives the increasing demand for offices of inspector general which necessarily entails intense political maneuvering The Power of Accountability is a uniquely useful resource for judging whether under what circumstances and how well OIGs fulfill their intended purpose and serve the public interest The Minnesota State Register ,2005 Family Supports and Improvement Program Minnesota.
