Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, at a pace of 3.0 to 3.5 miles per hour. The control group was instructed to continue with their current level of activity. The subjects were assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The walking program resulted in significant improvements in physical and psychological health compared to the control group. The walking program was a safe and effective intervention for improving the health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

Abstract: Staphylococcus aureus (Staph) is one of the most common bacterial pathogens responsible for nosocomial infections. Staphylococci are Gram-positive cocci that are often found in the skin, nose, and throat of healthy individuals. They are also found in the environment, including on surfaces and in food. Staphylococci are known for their ability to form biofilms, which are communities of bacteria that are attached to a surface and encased in a protective matrix. This makes them difficult to eradicate with antibiotics. Staphylococci are also known for their ability to produce toxins, which can cause a variety of diseases, including skin infections, pneumonia, and sepsis. In this study, we investigated the prevalence of Staphylococci in a hospital setting and the effectiveness of different disinfection methods in reducing their numbers. We found that Staphylococci were present in high numbers on surfaces and in the air of the hospital. Disinfection with bleach and alcohol was effective in reducing their numbers, but not with hydrogen peroxide. Our results suggest that regular disinfection with bleach and alcohol is necessary to control Staphylococci in a hospital setting.
