Mark, a college freshman, recently signed up for a credit card. The credit card had a 15% annual percentage rate (APR). Mark's statement for his September use of the card showed the balance owed after a minimum payment of only $5.00—3.5% off the balance. (A minimum is better!) Mark predicted that he would use the credit card only for necessities, such as textbooks or groceries. Mark had to make a credit card payment to the bank, even if he had no purchases or debts, so he had to make a payment at least once a month. Mark's credit card company, realizing this, made a policy of sending him a bill every month, even if he had no purchases or debts, so he had to make a payment at least once a month.
