Stability of Arguments and sources of power: Drawing a straight line from the fact that, during 1995, 60% of the new jobs were in the private sector¹ to the conclusion that the economy is 'free-market'² is a dangerous oversimplification. It is necessary to ask whether the new jobs were created by the private sector or by the public sector, and whether the public sector was able to create jobs in the private sector. If the public sector was able to create jobs in the private sector, then the economy is not 'free-market'.
