Equal in Mind "Society's accumulated myths and fears about disability and disease are as handicapping as are the physical limitations that flow from actual impairment." Society makes generalizations and stereotypes about the disabled and the disease stricken. Society as a whole has the belief that they are less of a person because of something they cannot change about themselves. Society places the disabled in a category by themselves, as an outcast from modern civilization. We think that if we include the disabled in everyday activities we could all one day become the same. Those who are disabled but are still mentally competent realize these exclusions. In "The able-bodied still don't get it" by Andre Dubus, he states that in a ...show more content...

She still shops, cleans, drives, eats, like any other woman her age. She recognizes the true reason advertisers do not target the disabled, they are afraid. Afraid of the fact that "depicting a disabled person in the ordinary activities of daily life is to admit that there is something ordinary about disability itself". Society isolates their problems to make them seem far away and unattainable, when they are so close, and could happen to anyone at anytime. The reason the disabled are isolated more than similar causes like race minorities, is that disability can happen to you involuntary. You cannot "turn" yourself African American, Caucasian, Asian, or Latino. Those are things you are born with. You could be like Andre Dubus, living life to the fullest, when one day something happens that would change your life forever, and your perspective on your new race, disability. Those who are disabled should be given as much opportunity as the "able bodies" do, not more to make them feel like they are being taken care of, just equal. They deserve to be recognized as true citizens of the world, not 2nd class. The disabled have so much to offer to the world, but are hardly ever given the chance. Maybe if we removed some boundaries and stereotypes, the world would be living at its full
