Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised exercise program on the health-related quality of life of older adults with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. The program was designed to improve physical and psychological health, and to reduce symptoms of depression and anxiety. The program was evaluated using a pre-test, post-test, and follow-up design. The results showed that the program had a positive effect on the health-related quality of life of older adults with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. The program was well-tolerated and had a low risk of adverse events. The authors conclude that a supervised exercise program can be an effective intervention for improving the health-related quality of life of older adults with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease.

Abstract and background: There are a number of reasons why the use of a single, one-dimensional measure of quality of life is inadequate. This paper discusses the importance of using a multi-dimensional measure of quality of life, and the importance of using a measure that is valid, reliable, and sensitive to change.
