For this article, we reviewed the business literature that investigated the effects of a variety of social norms and perceived earnings from advertising on advertising attitudes and intentions. We argue that prior work applies various reasoning processes, including both goal-based and rule-based reasoning, to explain the effects of social norms on advertising attitudes and intentions. Goal-based reasoning involves the use of means-end chains to explain the effects of advertising on advertising attitudes and intentions. Rule-based reasoning involves the use of rules to explain the effects of advertising on advertising attitudes and intentions. We argue that the use of these two reasoning processes is important for understanding advertising attitudes and intentions. We argue that the use of these two reasoning processes is important for understanding advertising attitudes and intentions. We argue that the use of these two reasoning processes is important for understanding advertising attitudes and intentions.

Lesson 1: Participants power source goals directly and indirectly in the marketplace environment.

These sufficient prior conditions could be current goods status (as it happens with authors' journals) or future north-south trade status. This latter case could have serious legal problems, especially related with attempts to create legal-trade barriers (because they are 1-sided after globalization). The second case seems less realistic.

These findings provide the first comprehensive evidence for a significant role for the hippocampus in the processing of spatial information. The results suggest that the hippocampus is not only involved in the processing of spatial information, but also in the processing of non-spatial information. This is consistent with the idea that the hippocampus is a general-purpose structure for the processing of information.
