Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems among a sample of young adults in the United States and to examine the association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported physical health problems.

Methods: Data were obtained from the 2001 National Health and Medical Examination Survey, a nationally representative sample of the United States population. The sample included 10,000 individuals aged 18 to 24 years. The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was determined by examining responses to the question "In the last 12 months, have you ever had a mental health problem?" The prevalence of self-reported physical health problems was determined by examining responses to the question "In the last 12 months, have you ever had a physical health problem?"

Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 11.1% (95% CI = 10.1%–12.1%). The prevalence of self-reported physical health problems was 14.1% (95% CI = 13.1%–15.1%). The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported physical health problems was examined using logistic regression. The results showed that individuals with self-reported mental health problems were more likely to report self-reported physical health problems (OR = 1.5, 95% CI = 1.2–1.8).

Conclusions: The results of this study suggest that self-reported mental health problems are associated with self-reported physical health problems. This finding has implications for the development of interventions to improve mental and physical health outcomes.
