

Class Surprise

The students in Mr. Montero's fourth-period English class had no idea what he was up to. They always got started right away with a reading or writing exercise in their notebooks, but today's instruction was to put all their books away and get their coats. They couldn't believe it—not doing work in his class was just beyond their imagination. And not doing work and leaving school? Maybe he was an impostor! But the students weren't going to question this change of pace, and they grew even more excited and puzzled when they heard they were walking to the park.

As soon as the class reached the park, everyone was ready to go straight to the ball fields and playground. But Mr. Montero had other plans. "We're here today to begin our new unit on haikus," he said. "Haikus are an ancient form of poetry about nature. Today, you're going to sit quietly with nature and reflect on your surroundings. I've brought pens and paper for you to take notes to prepare for composing your
