

IR protocol analyzer – user's manual

Overview

IR protocol analyzer is a universal application for automatic decoding binary codes of infrared remote control protocols. The application uses asynchronous input of a standard PC capture infrared signal from a remote control. As a consequence, the hardware receiver is unnecessary, and now its built-in just plug a photodiode to read off your remotes, that's all hardware required.

Application processes all data from a remote control and compares it with the own database of known protocols. When a match is found, packet is decoded and its characteristics is displayed to user including protocol name, description, decoded data and graph with timing.

Known definitions are added as separate XML file. That way, the user can create modified and new protocol definitions can be added by user. When an unknown packet is captured, user may still display its graph with timing details. Then, on the basis of the graph and timing, he may create new protocol definition.

All captured data can be saved to a file and recovered later. However, packet graph can be exported to a bitmap image.

Getting started

You may want test the application without any hardware receiver first. The user can create some testing data for you. You can find them in "samples" directory. The user sample data, known IR protocol samples and their own XML file (source file) is just sample. The user data will replace what the "sample" directory "source.xml" file. Copy this and call "Copy".

Now you can see remote captured packets in the samples list. Click a sample to view its packet details and graph. That's enough for now, refer to the user interface chapter for more information.

Building a simple IR hardware receiver

OK, you have just tested the application with some sample data and now you are certainly eager for creating your own remote controls. I don't build a receiver to collect all features of IR protocol analysis. Construction of a receiver is far simpler as it can be. All you need is a 1.5 Volt peak-to-peak, a photodiode (any type, it doesn't matter as long it's sensitive to infrared light – sensitivity near 800nm is ideal), a collecting pin and a piece of wire. Connect components like in the picture below.

The picture is given – that means that is basically no chance to hurt your remotes. However, be aware that you use the receiver like Philips CD45 (2000). For real responsibility for any damage done is your responsibility.
