The following article explores the links between sub-state nationalism and social policy. Instead of focusing only on the québécois-Canadian situation, the aim is to offer a comparative perspective that could enrich our understanding of the relationship between nationalism and social policy. In order to achieve that, this work sketches a theoretical framework that allows for a better understanding of the increasingly common meshing of national identity and social policy questions. Furthermore, this article explores the possible impact of nationalist movements on welfare state development. The objective is to show that sub-state nationalism and social policy are articulated together in at least three different ways. First, some regional governments enact social programs that can favour the construction of a territorial identity distinct from the one associated with the central state. Second, social policy issues frequently become poles of nationalist mobilization which may lead to a decentralization of social programs. Finally, nationalist movements are involved in the social policy agenda-setting process, at both the sub-state and the state levels. Empirically, the article illustrates the relationship between sub-state nationalism and social policy through a comparison between the Belgian (Flanders) and the Canadian (Québec) cases. Far from affecting only the specific regions in which nationalist movements exist, the meshing of sub-state nationalism and social policy can have an enduring impact on the broad elaboration of social policy in multinational states like Belgium and Canada.

L'article suivant explore les liens entre nationalisme sub-étatique et protection sociale. Au lieu de se confiner à la situation québécoise et canadienne, il s'agit d'offrir une perspective comparative susceptible d'enrichir notre compréhension des rapports entre nationalisme et politiques sociales. Pour ce faire, ce travail esquisse un cadre théorique permettant de mieux comprendre l'imbrication croissante des questions d'identité nationale et de protection sociale. De plus, le texte se penche sur l'impact possible des mouvements nationalistes sur le développement de l'État social. L'objectif est de montrer que le nationalisme sub-étatique et les questions de protection sociale s'articulent d'au moins trois manières différentes. Tout d'abord, les politiques sociales formulées par certains gouvernements régionaux peuvent participer à l'élaboration d'une identité distincte de celle associée à l'État central. Ensuite, les questions de protection sociale deviennent fréquemment des pôles de mobilisation nationaliste pouvant favoriser la décentralisation des programmes sociaux. Finalement, les mouvements nationalistes participent au processus d'inscription à l'agenda dans le domaine social, non seulement au niveau sub-étatique mais également au niveau étatique. Sur le plan empirique, l'article illustre la relation entre nationalisme sub-étatique et protection sociale en comparant les cas belge (Flandre) et
