

IR protocol analyzer – user's manual

Overview

IR protocol analyzer is a universal application for automatic decoding known types of infrared remote control protocols packets. The application uses asynchronous input of a standard PC capture infrared signal from a remote control. As a consequence, the hardware receiver is unnecessary, and even its built-in (just plug a photodiode into input of your soundcard), that's all hardware required.

Application processes all data from a remote control and compares it with the own database of known protocols. When a match is found, packet is decoded and its characteristics is displayed to user including protocol name, description, decoded data and graph with timing.

Known definitions are listed in separate XML file. That file, the user can create manually and new protocol definitions can be added by user. When an unknown packet is captured, user may still display its graph with timing details. Then, on the basis of the graph and timing, he may create new protocol description.

All captured data can be saved to a file and recovered later. Moreover, packet graph can be exported to a bitmap image.

Getting started

You may want test the application without any hardware receiver first. The user can create some testing data for you. You can find them in "samples" directory. The user samples show known IR protocol samples and their packet lists. For those files in your computer, the user dialog will appear, select the "nearest structure, please use it" group files and click "Open".

Now you can see known captured packets in the samples list. Click a sample to view its packet details and graph. That's enough for now, refer to the user interface chapter for more information.

Building a simple IR hardware receiver

OK, you have just tested the application with some sample data and now you are certainly eager for creating your own remote controls. I don't build a receiver for all types of IR protocols yet. Construction of a receiver is the simplest as it can be. All you need is a 1.5 Volt peak-to-peak, a photodiode (any type, it doesn't matter as long it's sensitive to infrared light – sensitivity near 800nm is ideal), a collecting pin and a piece of wire. Connect components like in the picture below.

The picture is given – that means that is basically no chance to hurt your soundcard. However, be aware that you use the receiver like Philips CD42 (M3). For real applications for any storage data is your responsibility.
