On the 29th of May 2014, the opinion piece 'Campus killer a hero of women haters' appeared in The Australian. In this article, the author argues in an informed and passionate tone that online misogynistic hate groups were the main cause of the Santa Barbara shootings. Towards the end of the article, there is a shift of tone and the article becomes more informative than opinionated.

From the beginning of the article, the author uses attacks to assert their position of authority and position the audience to agree with their contention. The title of the article, "Campus killer a hero of women haters" immediately appeals to the reader's sense of social justice and sets the tone of the article. The author attempts to persuade the reader throughout the article that the "culture of male entitlement" resulted in the Santa Barbara shootings. The author suggests that misogyny on the internet fuelled Elliot Rogers in his attack and persuades the audience accept their view as well as take it on as their own. This is done through the use of loaded language, which suggests to the reader that the author's opinion is the correct one. The author refers with authority to the Men's Rights Movement as "a nebulous group of male supremacists." The negative connotation associated with these words encourages the audience to accept the implication that these groups are entitled and do not have any clear idea of what they aim to do.

The author's use of loaded language is evident in the title, 'Campus killer a hero of women haters'. The word 'killer' is a strong, negative word that immediately sets a tone of violence and aggression. The word 'hero' is a positive word that is often used to describe someone who has done something brave or noble. By using the word 'hero' to describe the killer, the author is suggesting that the killer is a hero in the eyes of the women haters. The word 'women haters' is a negative word that suggests that the killer is a person who hates women. The author's use of these words is a clear attempt to persuade the reader that the killer is a hero and that the women haters are the ones who are responsible for the shootings.
